About the Workshop

The seasonal mobility of nomadic pastoral communities creates a unique set of challenges for mobile school teachers, including interrupted learning, mixed-age classrooms, diverse learning levels, and limited teaching resources. As children move with their families across different settlements and grazing landscapes, ensuring continuity of learning and building strong foundational skills requires flexible, inclusive and context-specific teaching approaches. Foundational Literacy and Numeracy (FLN) are essential for children's continued learning and development. This three-day capacity-building workshop under the HPT's Grasslands to Classrooms initiative aims to strengthen teachers' capacity to teach in seasonal mobile schools.

The workshop will explore practical, activity-based and experiential teaching methods that connect learning with children's everyday lives, cultural knowledge and nature. Through stories, songs, play, local languages, including Gojri, and the natural environment, teachers will explore ways to make learning more engaging, meaningful and accessible for children at different ages and learning levels. The workshop will also focus on adapting teaching strategies to multilevel classrooms, developing low-cost teaching-learning materials, identifying learning gaps and using simple assessment methods to track children's progress. By building on children's existing knowledge and experiences,

The aim is to stand with mobile teachers in creating learning spaces where every pastoral child has the opportunity just like any other child.

What are Seasonal Mobile Schools?

Seasonal Mobile schools is initiative by Govt of J&K, designed to meet the learning needs of children from pastoral communities who migrate with their families. These schools operate along migration routes or at temporary camps in Grasslands during Summer migration periods in the Alpine Grasslands of Kashmir.
